Sales Vocabulary Glossary

34 terms · Every term across the 12-Step Sales Process, the Pivot Points Playbook, and the KPI Scoring Definitions · Internal Training Use Only

One page, every word. Definitions live here; scripts live in their owning documents. When a term names a play, the entry states the rule that governs it. Alphabetical. (● = new)

The 4 C's — Concede, Commit, Convince, Close. The four moves on every objection, in that order. Concede is the most important: put yourself on the customer's side before you do anything else. Maps to our flow as tactical empathy → isolation → reassure/overcome → re-close and T.O. chain.

Accusation Audit — Saying the customer's negative thought out loud before they do: "You're probably braced for me to spend two hours pressuring you." Naming the fear disarms it. Used at the pact call-out and the Upfront Contract. Can be phrased as a question ("Is it crazy to think...?").

Buying Signal — Behavior that says the decision is already made, even when the words sound like an objection. The spouse look after pricing (Mum's the Word) and "your competitor is cheaper" are both buying signals. The play on a buying signal is usually silence, not selling.

Calibrated Question ● — An open question — almost always starting with "How" or "What" — that hands the customer the illusion of control while steering the conversation where you need it. It makes THEM solve the problem instead of you pushing. "How am I supposed to give you all that at their price?" is the strongest. Two hard rules: never lead with "why" (it's a burner on a hot stove — it makes people defensive; convert "why did you" to "what caused you to"), and tone is everything — calm and deferential is a request for help; an edge makes it an accusation.

Cinch the Knot — Revisiting a commitment the customer made earlier and tying it into the close. The tie down plants it; the cinch collects it. "You told me the most important thing was never worrying about this again — that's exactly what this handles."

Conditional Commitment — A yes locked in before the condition is tested: "If that were the payment, would we be moving forward while I'm here?" Always secured BEFORE the manager call — otherwise the manager negotiates against air.

Cool Down / Take-Away — Step 12. After the signature, you re-sell the decision and try to talk them out of it: "Before I put this in, I want to be sure there's no reason you'd turn around and cancel." Surfaces reversal risks at the table instead of in a cancellation email.

Diagnose the Money — Sorting a money stall into its real condition — value, affordability, timing, comparison, or structure — before running any play. Mirror + 4 seconds + "How do you mean?" Their next sentence names the condition. Treating before diagnosing is the #1 rep failure at the close.

Drill — A live rep-and-partner exercise with sets, reps, and a pass condition. Not a discussion, not a read-through — performed out loud, scored pass/fail. The six drills live at the end of the Pivot Points Playbook.

Exit-Sell Line — "If one of those bids is better than ours, I want to be the first to tell you." A confidence play that lives inside the parachute ONLY. Used earlier in the appointment, it invites shopping before the wall exists.

FM DJ Voice — The calm, low, downward-inflected tone every objection gets met with. If your pitch rises when the objection lands, you've turned the close into an argument and lost it.

GBB — Good / Better / Best. The three-package structure. Also the rescope tool: when the budget genuinely can't reach the number, you move the tier or the scope — never the price.

Isolation — Confirming that one thing is the ONLY thing between you and the schedule: “Other than the investment, is there anything else?” The Final Bridge is isolation before pricing; the close re-runs it on every objection.

Label — Naming the customer’s emotion or position out loud: “It sounds like that rule has saved you from a bad contractor before.” A label proves you heard them without agreeing or arguing. Always “It seems / sounds / looks like” — never “I.” Can be phrased as a statement or, with rising tone, a question.

Mirror — Repeating their last few words back as a question, then 4 seconds of silence: “Think about it?” The mirror goes FIRST on every objection because it makes them reveal the direction before you commit to one. The shortest calibrated question. Whoever talks first after the mirror loses.

Mum’s the Word — The spouse look after price is presented: one approves, checks the other for sign-off. Highest-stakes silence in the process. PRESENT PRICES. BE QUIET. The 4-second floor has no ceiling here.

No-Oriented Question — A question where “no” moves the deal forward: “Would you be against taking a look?” People protect themselves with no; a no-oriented door lets them say it and still walk through. The default swap for every yes-trap.

One-Legger — An appointment where only one decision-maker is home. A booking failure first, a protocol second: full inspection, ZERO pricing, return visit with both homeowners locked before you leave.

Open-Ended Question • — Any question that can’t be answered with yes or no — it opens the floor and pulls a longer answer. All calibrated questions are open-ended, but not all open-ended questions are calibrated: “What do you do for work?” opens; “How am I supposed to do that?” opens AND steers. The opposite of the yes-trap. Use it any time you want them talking and revealing — discovery, the deck, and after every label.

The Pact — The agreement the homeowners made with each other before you arrived: “no matter what, we’re not signing tonight.” Not a reaction to you — it predates you. That’s why value-building can’t touch it: saying yes would mean breaking a promise to their spouse in front of a stranger.

Pact Called Out — Naming the pact respectfully instead of selling into it, with an accusation audit in front: “It feels like you two decided before I got here that tonight was off the table — and I respect that.” Once it’s in the open, you can work with it.

The Parachute — The exit play when the close is dead (stone wall). Three moves: release the pressure, the respect ask (“would you be against not signing with anyone the night they’re out, either?”), and booking the review visit after their last estimate — day and time locked before you leave. You stop closing the sale and close the rematch.

Picture Exit — Stepping out to take genuinely needed photos so the decision-makers get room to talk (the porchlight close). Only legal if the pictures are real — fake busywork is manufactured, and manufactured anything is off the table.

Re-Close — Asking for the sale again after an objection is resolved. Every path through every scenario ends the same way: PRICE → re-close → T.O. chain. Handling an objection without re-closing is answering a question nobody asked.

Rescope — Changing what’s being bought instead of what it costs: move the tier (Best → Better → Good) or move the scope (now versus later). The fallback when the T.O. chain can’t reach their number. The price never moves at the table; the scope can.

Safe Space Close — Step 3, verbatim: “I can take a NO just as graciously as I can take a YES.” Planted at the Upfront Contract, collected all appointment long — it’s what makes the picture exit, the pact call-out, and the parachute land as trust instead of tactics.

SAMFAM — Set A Meeting From A Meeting. A follow-up secured in the home, with a day and time, beats any outreach after it. No unsold exit without a locked next step — “I’ll follow up next week” is a fail; “Thursday at 6” is a pass.

Stone Wall — A customer who will not buy while you’re in the house, no matter what. Quiet version: polite and immovable. Announced version: the pact declared at the door. Both route to the parachute; the announced version gets called out first.

T.O. Chain — Turn Over chain: Manager → designated second/third → Jose H. The ONLY path pricing relief travels. Full price is the only price a rep quotes; if relief exists, it comes from the manager’s mouth on the call — never invented at the table.

“That’s Right” — The moment the customer confirms your summary of THEIR OWN case in THEIR OWN words. Different from “you’re right” (which means “stop talking”). Triggered by a summary (label + paraphrase). The breakthrough word — strive for it before every close.

Tie Down — A commitment banked mid-presentation for later use: “Fair to say the crew matters more than the brand on the shingle?” Slide 9 banks three of them. The one place a yes-oriented question is legitimate — you’re confirming buy-in, not pressuring. Tie downs and cinching the knot go hand in hand.

The Triangle — Three variables, customer picks two: great company & warranties, top-of-the-line products, lowest price. Nobody gets all three from anybody. The price objection’s home remedy.

Upfront Contract — Step 3’s expectation statement: what today looks like, start to finish, including that prices come at the end — agreed to before the inspection. It’s why nothing later feels like a surprise or a trap.

Yes-Trap — A question engineered so the customer can only agree: “Is that correct?” “Wouldn’t you agree it’s easier...?” “Does that make sense?” Reads as pressure, builds resistance. Every yes-trap gets converted to a no-oriented door or an open-ended question — recognizing them on sight is a Top Rep exam skill. (The one exception: a tie-down, which confirms rather than pressures.)
